David works for the Cooperative Forestry national office of the US Forest Service. He is the Woody Biomass Utilization Program Manager, which focuses on adding value to small diameter trees and slash. The program has a strong emphasis on converting wood to energy. The program integrates the use of wood with landscape restoration, climate change, renewable energy goals and desired landowner objectives. He has a B.S. in Forest Science from Humboldt State University - 1979 and an M.S. in Forest Ecology from the University of Montana - 1996, where he did a thesis on definitions of Old Growth forests.
